money. Senator Janssen, I think, is kind of mixing his metaphors around here this morning. He had talked about giving this money or these credits, or whatever you want to call it, to these people to try to make it seem like it's not an expenditure. If it's not an expenditure, it's not going to cost us anything. So let's give them 120 percent of what it would cost to go to school if it doesn't cost anything. But what he said that caught my attention was where he said, when you give this money out, it goes round and round and round. Senator Janssen, Senator Redfield, is as about...about far...as far up the trail as I am, and I think he mixes things up. 'Cause there was a song and it's talking about a trumpet. You push the middle valve down. Then the music goes round and round, whoa-ho-ho-ho, and then it comes down here. See, he's talking about music. We're talking about money. When Senator Hilgert and, before him, Senator Tim Hall and others who've supported legislation relative to increases in unemployment compensation or workers' comp, everybody suddenly says that's too much money. But if the money's going to go round, round and round and round, and fuel the economy, why does that principle not hold true there? When we talk about programs to help the truly needy in the state we don't hear people saying that once you put money into their hands it's going to immediately go back into circulation, which it will. But they don't talk about it then. I had said this is like the telescope principle. When they're talking about a benefit to the truly needy, they look through the end of it that makes a mouse look like an elephant, like you're giving so much. But then, when it comes to a program like this where it's for a sort of elite group, then you turn it around and it shrinks the elephant down to the appearance of a mouse. There is not consistency, but I think in this case there just is not wisdom. Somebody, or maybe some bodies, had talked about...

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...how difficult it would be, once you put this in place, to ever remove it. It came to my attention in an article I read the other day that there's a federal excise tax that appears on our phone bills and it was put there to underwrite the World War II effort. The World War II has been over for a time, but that excise tax is still there, even though
